ASEA STOCK TYPE

STOCK STANDARD OF EXCELLENCE

General Impression: The Stock Small Equine should be attractive and well-balanced, displaying a heavier structure while maintaining the form of a "horse in miniature." All body parts should blend harmoniously. Stock horses are judged based on balance and structural correctness.

Head: The head should be short and broad, with a straight or slightly dished profile. The horse should have small ears and large, well-placed eyes. Nostrils should be large, and the muzzle small.

Bite: The bite should be even, with no more than a 3mm gap between the upper and lower jaws.

Neck: The neck should join the shoulders at a 45-degree angle. It should be medium to long, slightly arched, and well-muscled without appearing cresty. The throatlatch should be slender, and the neck should blend smoothly into the shoulders and head, with the top line of the neck longer than the underside.

Shoulder: The shoulders should be set at a 45-degree angle, well-muscled, and smoothly integrated into the body and withers.

Back and Body: The Stock Small Equine should have a short, well-muscled back that transitions smoothly into the croup. The barrel should be deep with well-sprung ribs, and the croup should not be higher than the withers, with allowances made for younger horses still growing.

Hindquarters: The hindquarters should be broad, deep, and well-muscled through the thigh, stifle, gaskin, and down to the hock.

Legs and Hooves: The legs should be straight, true, and correct, with adequate bone structure. The fetlocks and hooves should both be at a 45-degree angle, with hooves that are proportionate, round, and well-shaped, seamlessly joining the fetlocks.

Movement: Stock Small Equines should exhibit true and correct movement, with a ground-covering stride.
